

Why do we store the result of LINQ queries in a variable of type var?

The returned type is always a single value.

var is the type returned by LINQ queries.

The returned type does not exist.

The returned type is not always known.

Correct! LINQ queries return either a single value or a generic type IEnumerable<T>, but the actual type is not always easy to determine.

Continue